There is not much excitement in camp, all is still, the boys are all in their tents, for the clouds are leading. Indeed I find that that we are in a ready place, and although we are camped on the top of a hill we have a famous place for wind. It commenced raining about the time we came here and kept it up pretty steady for eight or ten days, and now that old sun by a steady application of his rays had just got the mud all dried up, it has commenced raining again and soon we shall have a continual of mud but of mind over everything except what we can hide away in our knapsacks.
